

The incidence of idiopathic neonatal hepatitis in the general population is unknown. The proportion of cases classified as “idiopathic” has diminished as advanced diagnostic techniques and a better molecular understanding of cholestatic diseases in general have allowed physicians to diagnose many infants as being affected with specific syndromes. In the past, these infants would have been included as having idiopathic neonatal hepatitis.