

Lesch-Nyhan syndrome is a rare disorder that affects males. Rarely, females may be affected by the disorder. However, in most cases, females may be carriers of the disease gene, but do not exhibit any symptoms. According to one estimate, the disorder occurs at the rate of approximately one in 380,000 births in the United States.