

SGS affects males and females in equal numbers and occurs worldwide with no ethnic predisposition. There are currently approximately 40 known patients in the general population. Because of the similar symptoms, SGS is often misdiagnosed as Loeys-Dietz or Marfan syndrome. The disorder is probably underdiagnosed, making it difficult to determine its true frequency.