

ATR-X syndrome affects males. More than 200 cases have been reported to laboratories conducting molecular genetic testing. However, because this disorder is underdiagnosed it is difficult to determine its true frequency in the general population. Female carriers of the mutated gene do not usually develop any manifestations.