

A diagnosis of tularemia is made by a thorough clinical evaluation, a detailed patient history, and a variety of tests that may include an attempt to isolate the bacteria from blood or body tissue or through specialized blood tests (serologic tests) that measure the body's immune system response against the bacterium.