

Neurotrophic keratitis is a rare disorder. One estimate places the prevalence at below 5 people per every 10,000 in the general population. Prevalence is the number of people who have a disorder in a specific population at a given time; such as how many people have neurotrophic keratitis in the United States in a given year.